

The Eye of The Dragon

Special thanks to all those that have helped in the making of this book.

Hazel Stone (Mum) for inspiring me to write.

Christine Wright proofreading and editing

Susan Stone illustrator and inspiration for Eson and Skyrow.

And a special thank you to Laura Bennett who help guide me.

Copyright © 2020 by John A Stone

All rights reserved. This book or any portion thereof may not be reproduced or used in any manner whatsoever without the express written permission of the Author except for the use of brief quotations in a book review.

ISBN: 9789403624617

Imprint: Independently published

Contents

Chapter One- Dark magic ... 6
Chapter Two- The Wizard's Apprentice ... 35
Chapter Three- A new friend ... 85
Chapter Four- The Battle Mage ...106
Chapter five- Past truths. ... 129
Chapter six- Passage to The Maze. ... 151
Chapter Seven - The Long Journey Begins ... 191
Chapter seven- Biting cold and deep passages ...223
Chapter eight – Of Fire and Thunder ... 245
Chapter nine- To the North ... 265
Chapter ten- Eson's island. ... 293
Chapter eleven – The war of Reki ... 317
Chapter Twelve – Rejoice ... 345
Appendix - The Wrath of the Dragon Lord ... 365
 Glossary ... 405
 People. ... 405
 Places ... 406
 Species/race ... 408
 Animals/creatures ... 408
 Other ... 409

Chapter One- Dark magic

The two kingdoms of Mankind have always been separated.

The eastern kingdom of Nova. With the thick, tall black walls protecting it from all sides, stood east of the mighty Calzarian forest. That deep and old place, full of all manner of creatures. It had long stood at the heart of our vast land, always acting as a border between the two kingdoms.

Castle Rinver as it was now known stood proud to the south of the large city of Mankind acting as its capital.

The kingdom of Orrél sat west of this vast forest and at the foot of the great Dúraian mountain range that split the very land in two.

There stood the ancient Castle Orrél, right on the borders of the twin cities of Orly and Canzo.

I had known the two kings, Egiling Rinver and Dontus Conduits, since their early childhood. Many times, they would run into me when I visited the castles to perform my duties as head of The Order. Much to my delight, the two boys had formed a deep friendship and I hoped that they would unite the kingdoms of mankind someday.

Little Egiling, a sweet charming. Dark-haired boy, with those deep green eyes so full of hope, wonder and a little mischief. He now ruled over Nova.

Little Dontus, that shy, weedy, brown haired boy with his deep blue eyes always sparkling in the sun. full of kindness and hope. Now ruled over Orrél.

They had both grown into great kings. Wise and strong ruling with grace and kindness.

Soon the time for marriage had come, I performed their ceremonies and each acted as the others best man. To still see those childhood friends as close as brothers filled my old Dwarfish heart with such joys.

Unfortunately, this friendship came to an abrupt end for it was rumoured that one night. After too much mead and wine. The two had begun to fight and argue with each other, perhaps over a misplaced or misunderstood word. Since neither would speak of that night. I could not conclude what happened and I deeply suspected that neither could either of them.

I tried my best to prevent war between them but war was declared. Although no blow or blood had come to pass. The tension and anger between to two could be felt a crossed the land.

I used my fellow Order member, Dengard's position as court wizard of Orrél to try and rekindle friendship between the two but it seemed hopeless. The two had grown too cold and bitter towards each other.

It took, Dengard and myself three long years of hard work. Just to get them to agree to a meeting. We had arranged for them to meet in the Elven city of Teethoftheearth. We Dwarfs had gifted the Elves the city some time ago in an act of friendship.

For two months the talks continued and finally in the spring of the second year the two had agreed to put the silly argument behind them and once again become friends.

I suspected that in part, this was not only due to mine and Dengard's persistence but the fact the two had more or less completely forgotten why they had started to war with each other in the first place.

One year of peace had passed between the two kings and to my delight they were again trading and speaking with each other, almost as if nothing had happened.

I was also informed of the joyous news that Queen Crawa Conduits had given birth to a baby girl. She was a strong, independent little thing. No doubt inherited that from her late mother, whose life had been lost during the birth.

Her passing saddened the two kingdoms greatly. She was well loved and vast crowds had turned out for her funeral.

Lining the cobbled streets as far as the eye could see, all waiting to pay their respects to their beloved queen.

Her coffin was made of smooth mahogany, with four golden handles.

Flower reefs were place all along its side in that white carriage with large glass windows.

The carriage was drawn by four black steeds, each with a deep purple velvet sash, embroidered with the royal seal of a hand rising from a lake clutching a sword. They were draped over the steed's broad backs.

As the carriage rolled along the people would throw flowers and wept as it passed to the east. Where the queen would be laid to rest in the royal tomb, in the necropolis just north of the outer farming district of the city.

For the next two months the cities wept and mourned. Further delaying the traditional blessing of the new royal. It was usually performed the day after the birth and acted as protection. It also ingrained a strong sense of justice and honour into their very being.

Two uneventful years passed and in the autumn of the third, the two kings met once again. I facilitated the meeting and that is when I learnt that Queen Ceolburh Rinver was with child.

Dengard had discovered the foetus was male and this is what had sparked their meeting.

The two kings discussed this at great length and to my surprise they decided that their children were to wed upon their sixteenth year.

The kingdom of Man was to at last unite under one banner and I could not help but smile at the thought. I had desired this greatly and always hoped it would come to pass. Yet I did not think it would happen within my long-life time.

Egiling invited me to come to Castle Rinver and to stay until the boy was born.

Over the next few days, I hardly slept, partly from the excitement of the coming birth and from that odd energy I could feel. I would pace the guest room, sending out my mind's eye to see if I could find where that energy was coming from.

I could feel its ill intent. Although it appeared to be a few miles away it was coming closer. I could not quite work out what it was at first but there was something familiar about it. I had felt it before some time ago back when....

Then it hit me. I knew who I felt in the darkness.... Reki.

I had once taken her under my tutelage, she unlike most of humankind had developed her magical ability later in life.

Typically, I test for magical ability before a child turns ten. Usually by then it is clear if they contain the spark or not.

But with Reki, she was a middle-aged scullery maid for the Lord of the town Tyne O Rew, which stood atop the vast frozen lake at the heart of The Maze.

I had only been passing by when I felt her power manifest.

Never before had an older human developed their magic. I saw her cast down a bolt of lightning, killing another servant in a fit of rage.

Needless to say, she passed out after her limit had been exceeded.

She was so scared and I felt it my duty to teach her to control her power.

I should have stripped them when I had the chance. She grew powerful under my guidance and I was pleased with her progress.

I'd foolishly allowed her to join our Order. It was only after this that I caught her, a few times reading books on necromancy and summoning. I dismissed this as an odd curiosity at the time.

I should have listened to what the witnesses said. But I did not wish to believe them at first. One had seen her reanimate and command the butchered remains of that poor cat she had killed. Another said they had seen her summoning dark shadows.

By the time I went to investigate she had long gone. Disappearing from my sight and eventually my scrying spells entirely.

Twenty years have passed and now she is searching for me. I would have to prepare myself for a fight.

With the sense of foreboding I could barely concentrate, as I sat outside the king's chamber, I could hear the screams of labour and then the cries of the new born.

It was the early arns of the morning when Markus had entered into the world so full of dangers.

The pride on both their faces once I entered the room and saw the small bundle wrapped in silk. He slept quietly. I could not help but smile.

The moment I left the room, I got to work and warded the castle, I would not allow her to enter.

I would instead meet her face on, outside the city if possible, to limit the damage that I foresaw happening.

But late that night I felt my wards break with such force that it shook me to the core. She had grown strong indeed in those lost years.

But I felt and knew she had something darker acting as her aid. For my power was still greater than hers.

I could not ignore this act and rushed to the king's chamber. I had to get them out. She was bringing the fight to me at this very mark.

I frantically tapped upon the heavy oak door of the king's chamber.

'My lord! A foul evil stirs this night. My wards are broken! You must flee!' I bellowed.

The door swung open and there stood the king and queen dressed ready for battle.

‘Nay old friend, we will not run. But face whatever evil alongside you.’

It was then we heard the approaching footsteps. They were slow and calculating. We prepared ourselves, but were relieved to see that it was the wet nurse, carrying a fussing Markus.

‘Forgive me my lords, lady. I did not mean to rouse you. The young prince will not settle this night. He refused his last feed. I hoped a walk along the corridors would settle him.’

The king gave a raised brow. He knew as well as I that the ill feeling about the castle had disturbed the prince greatly.

‘Fear not Hillary, give Markus to Bulpazard and flee. Something comes this night.’

No sooner had he finished the sentence, the corridor became ice cold and an ill wind bellowed down the corridors, like a scream of rage it bounced off the walls and echoed.

The creaking crack of the creeping crystals of ice erupted from the stone and our breath turned to a mist.

Hillary ran and I tried to blink away, but something interrupted it. Nothing in this world that I knew of could prevent a blink. It confirmed she had greater forces aiding her this night.

What deal had she struck with the Arcmondane?

‘Go Bulpazard, get Markus away from this place!’ Those words, were the last I heard from my dear friend’s mouth. I ran as fast as my stout legs could carry me. Attempting to blink to safety, each time I was stopped.

The urge to turn and defend the king and queen grew with each step.

When I heard that horn sound out, bellowing throughout the castle. I knew the king had called to him his knights. This was a battle I would have to miss.

The precious bundle I carried stirred and fussed, but a calming spell put him into a deep slumber. I could not risk his cries drawing the attention of the enemy.

Panting and out of breath, I had managed to get to the stables. Hoping there would be a horse I could use, but nothing.

I tried to blink again forcing my will to take me from this place.

The next I knew I stood in the farming town of Oak Grove. The flickering of the lamps and smell of animal dung told me I was only a few yards from the home of someone I had tried to help years ago.

A young couple that wished to have a child, yet despite my best efforts I could not aid them. This was an opportunity I could not give up. The child would be safe here providing I dealt with her.

I had to act quickly and forced my aching feet onwards, I hobbled using my staff as a support. For the first time I felt my age upon me. I was not a young dwarf anymore.

I banged on the wooden door, almost breaking it in my haste.

Serge and Hitony would take care of this child. I knew that much, but I could not linger and feared I would have to abandon the child on their doorstep.

But a light coming from the cracks in the wooden door told me I have at last roused one or even both of them.

I summoned a mist so thick that it would hide my presence here. I could not afford to be seen.

It was Serge that opened the door to me. I thrust the quite baby into his arms.

‘I have little time to explain. I must return at once to Nova. Please watch this babe, I shall return as soon as I can.’

I stood, shocked and strangely relieved.

We had always wanted a child, but to receive one like this, completely unannounced was not what we expected.

It was so still in my arms. Wrapped in that silk, I had wondered where the wizard had brought this babe from.

I closed the door and took the infant into our room. The wooden floor creaking and groaning as it usually did.

‘What have you there?’ Hitony asked. Her frail weary voice coming from the darkness of the room.

She had been ill for over a week now. Some form of fever or so Bulpazard reckoned, his cures seemed to be lifting whatever it was and in good time too.

‘Bulpazard just gave me this little babe.’

‘Oh Serge, our dreams have come true! Did he say where it was from and its name?’

‘No, he put it in my arms then vanished. Said he had something to do in Nova. We must watch over this child till he returns.’

‘May I hold it?’ Hitony asked. She seemed brighter and appeared to have more life to her, than she had before.

I gently gave her the sleeping bundle and that look on her face, barely visible in the darkness of the room. I could tell this child had brought her joy and comfort. I hoped Bulpazard would not whizz it away with him once he returned. That would break both our hearts.

She gently rocked the babe and held it close. We dared not unwrap the bundle as it slept deeply. Clearly it was under some spell.

I appeared in amongst the trees, a mile or so from the western gate of Nova, a dark spell had prevented me blinking into the city itself.

I could already see the smoke rising from the city, I knew one person could not have done a lot of damage in the time I was gone. I knew she had aid. No doubt she had summoned demons to torment the fleeing people.

I heard the horrid shrill cries of the Mankai, eager to make me their evening meal.

They clearly had no idea who I was!

As they drew close to me, I willed the tip of my staff to emit a light.

They screamed and hid their delicate eyes from its blinding radiance. But something else drove them onwards. Normally the light would have been enough to make them scarper. But that mad glint in their black eyes told me they were either under some spell or possessed.

They came lunging at me as I defended myself from their razor-sharp claws.

I had no time to deal with these creatures. I had to get to the castle.

In one motion I drew the petrifying rune in the very air and willed it to take effect.

Within a matter of marks the creatures now stone bodies crashed to the ground shattering into pieces.

I made haste to the castle, smashing through the wards she had conjured to prevent my return.

I passed the screaming people running from fire and dark shadows. I knew only a few would survive this night.

I finally got to the castle where many a knight was deep in battle with lower-level demons.

I aided them the best I could, striking many a demon with the banishing spell. But there were too many of them. I had to get inside, to her. Once I took her down, they would slowly be banished from this place.

There inside the great hall of broken tables and blooded bodies. Egiling and Ceolburh fought with Reki herself and a foul shadow she had summoned.

She was not the woman I once knew. Her bent haggard form showed her old age. Yet something prevented her body decaying. She fought with all the ferocity of a young wild woman.

I tapped my staff upon the ground with such force the very stones cracked as I released my power. Driving the wrench back.

‘Go!’ I shouted as I slammed her back with balls of magic.

Time slowed to a crawl in that moment as the two-ran passed me to attempt to get to safety.

The sheen of a sword edge drew my eye and in that mark that evil shadow had the king’s head.

My heart shattered and my rage built.

I could not let myself lose control and become berserk.

The queen swung in madness and grief. There was nothing I could do but watch as that foul blade pierced her heart.

Seeing her lifeless form collapse choking blood. Broke me and in that moment, I lost control.

The infamous Dwarvish berserker rage took me and my full power was unleashed.

Magic flowed from me like a river, crashing down a mountain. I had lost control of my thoughts and my instinct took over.

My power brought down the very castle itself. In my rage I had opened a rift between the very fabric of reality and cast her into the endless nothingness along with her demons.

I awoke sometime later, just outside the gates to the kingdom and found that they had been sealed shut by powerful magic. I could hear the pleas and cries of those on the other side of those gates. My power had done this. I had trapped a number unknown in that city along with those foul sprites she had conjured.

There was nothing I could do; the spell had been cast in my enraged state and nothing apart from my very death would undo the spell.

My heart wept for them and sadness overcame me.

What have I done? I pray I will be forgiven for this act. Nothing can enter nor escape my spell and those within are doomed to die a horrid death.

The thought of those that had managed to escape my spell and the troubles of that night were all I had to comfort me in that mark.

I crawled from those gates, across the desert sand as far north as I could before succumbing to exhaustion and blood loss.

-Oak Grove-

That thick mist has lingered for three days now. Although is beginning to clear. Much to the disappointment of the children of the village, who would play in it.

Their careless laughter had awoken me from my troubled sleep. I had wondered as to when the wizard would return. I had begun to worry for the old dwarf. For him not to send a message was unlike him, Even Dengard had not had any news from him. But he didn't seem too troubled by it.

I still hadn't quite got used to those Fae appearing beside me and telling me the message. It always made me jump, but I missed it at this point.

My thoughts were interrupted by a knocking at the door.

How glad I was when I opened it to Bulpazard's smiling face. His salt and pepper fur almost matched the fading mist.

'There you are. I was beginning to worry.'

I step aside to let the wizard enter. He smiled warmly.

'There is no need to worry about me my old friend. Tell me how is Markus?'

‘So that is his name! We were wondering what we should call him. Have to say he is a spirited little thing, when he’s awake. He’s sleeping with Hitony.’

Bulpazard nodded.

‘Good, sleep is best for them both. Did you get the medicine and that bottle of milk?’

‘Yes, Dengard brought them, I even asked him if he knew where you were. I assumed you wizards all know where the other is. Anyway, that potion seems to be doing the trick. Hitony’s fever is down and she is recovering well.’

‘I have to say that milk you sent; Markus seems to really like it.’

‘My diagnosis is correct then. She has Gwerts, it’s not life threatening as I am sure you know it is a common ailment around these parts.

That is good to hear, it’s a special blend and will give him strength; I shall arrange for more to be delivered. May I see them both?’
Bulpazard asked.

I knocked on the door, in the hope that our voices had roused Hitony. Her sweet voice filled my heart with joy and we both entered the room.

Hitony was sat up in the bed and lent against the wooden wall of our home. The bottle of milk in her hand feeding Markus.

Her face half fell when she saw Bulpazard.

‘You both seem to be doing well. I did hope you would become well enough to care for Markus.’ He smiled as if he knew what Hitony had been thinking.

‘You’re not taking him then?’ She asked hopefully.

Her face lit up as Bulpazard shook his head. ‘No, He is safe here and I know he will be cared for greatly. Please understand that I cannot reveal where he came from. This is for his protection and yours. Raise him as if he were your own. Should the others ask, Hitony gave birth whilst ill. That would explain his sudden appearance. Speaking of your illness, give it a few more weeks and you should be fine. It is Gwerts and will pass without any further harm, I will arrange for Dengard to bring the medicine and the milk to you for I must away. I will be gone for some time. Fair well for now.’ With that he vanished.

You would have thought I’d be used to wizards disappearing suddenly but no. These things still shocked me and I often wonder how they did it. Neither of us had any magical powers and I could only imagine what it was like to be a wizard.

I could not believe that nine years had passed already. There had been no word or sign of Bulpazard in all that time.

We had a hyperactive, imaginative child to deal with and Bulpazard’s presence was all but forgotten.

Markus is a shy lad and despite my efforts to get him to play with the other children of the village, he was more content with his invisible, hopefully imaginary friends.

He would spend hours alone in his little room adjacent to ours. It had once been my storage place for the pots I made. But now I kept them in the lean to where I make them. The jewellery Hitony makes, I still keep in our room in the chest I made with my own two hands.

Hitony and I spoke one night about the possibility of me taking him with me to Sinto market. Many of the other children his age was already helping their folks in the fields and with the Doogins.

‘Perhaps the trip will do him good. He will have to speak with the customers, maybe it’ll bring him out of his shell.’

I could only agree with her. He was almost ten years of age now and since the age of seven he would ask to come along with me.

I was sure it would be safe enough and, in my heart, I knew he would likely enjoy it.

‘I’ll tell him in the morning. What a birthday surprise that’ll be.’

Hitony beamed a wide smile as she pulled the woollen covers up to her chin. Making herself more comfortable for the night.

I could hear them talking through the wall and had to hold my mouth from squealing in excitement.

Dad was going to take me with him. I had hoped, I'd be able to go soon and now it was going to happen. On my birthday too!

I must have fallen asleep sometime in the early arns as next I knew dad was gently shaking me through the fleece that kept me warm at night. I lay under that warm fleece on top the sheet mum had weaved. To keep the hay underneath from scratching me.

It was really early in the arn. Way before sunrise as I rubbed the sleep from my eyes. Excitement filled me again as I realised it was morning.

‘It’s time to get up. Hurry and get dressed now. I’ll be needing your help in the market today.’

I jumped out of bed and felt the sting of the cold floor beneath my bare feet.

The cold air made my skin go prickly as I quickly pulled on my tunic. It was way too big for me and I had to tie the belt a few times. But I like it. It was warm and cosy. One of my dad’s old ones, I think.

I quickly followed after dad and I could hear the pattering of my feet on the wooden floor.

Our boots were kept by the front door and I was hurrying to keep stride with my dad.

I pulled on the hide boots. Dad had made me them a year ago. They still had plenty of life left in them before I needed new ones.

‘Ready dad!’ I beamed wide standing as tall as I could, my chest puffed out in pride.

Once we were outside, I realised how dark it was. The lamps were still lit and I was a little scared.

‘Go fetch Sharof, whilst I get the cart ready.’

Those words made me overcome my fear.

I liked Sharof. She was a fine horse. I wasn’t sure how old she was but I knew dad had her long before I was born.

She had black and white spots all over her body and she was a lot bigger than me.

This was the first time I had gone to get her from the little shed she was housed in.

It was built a long time ago, probably when our house was. It sat only a few feet away from the house.

Sometimes, when dad was too tired from the trip, he would ask me to lead her back into her home. I had to make sure I tied the rope tight, through the metal hoop attached to the stone wall.

I opened the big shed door, and in the darkness, I could hear her give a whinny. She knew it was me. She probably heard me coming.

‘Hello girl.’ I said approaching her calmly just as dad told me to do.

I could just about reach up to her snout and gave it a little stroke.

Her rains were kept in the shed with her and hung on a bent nail from one of the posts.

I had to stretch up on tip toe to get them down. I put them over my shoulders and could feel how heavy they were.

I managed to undo the rope and held it in both hands.

Sharof followed me out into the early morning, she was such a good horse. Walking nicely just behind me.

I led her to the lean to my dad had built onto the house. I wasn't allowed inside there until now. As that big kiln was often lit and it made odd noises as the fire roared inside.

My dad was just outside the lean too busy putting pots into the cart he also kept in there.

I handed him the rope and he took the rains from my aching shoulders.

‘Thank you. I still have a few jars to put on. Could you go and fetch the jewellery from our room.’

I nodded excitedly and rushed off.

I was careful when I opened the door. I didn't want to wake mum. She worked so hard making the necklaces and bands. Often, she would not get to bed until late.

I peeked over as I opened the door of the chest, mum was still sound asleep.

I pulled out my tunic a little to make a pouch and carefully placed in a few handfuls of the things that were inside. I then hurried back outside where dad was attaching Sharof to the cart.

‘Mum must have been up all night making these.’ I said with a grin on my face.

‘She was up well into the late arns. Come on now, place them into one of the pots and let's get moving. The sun will rise soon.’

I placed them carefully into the one closest to the back of the cart.

Then with a squeeze I managed to fit in beside my dad on the driver's seat.

To my surprise he handed me the reins.

'Tug and say yip.'

I did as he said and the cart started to move. It was then I felt his hand take back the reins.

He smiled and with his free hand ruffled my hair.

The cart bounced along down the dirt road that led from our home.

Passed the fields of wheat, barley and the pens of Doogins. Already grazing as the sun started to appear over the mountains.

We soon passed beyond the wooden gates of the village. This was further than I had ever been before and the excitement was too much for me. I stared wide eyed at the vast endless grass lands and to our right a deep wood. Beyond that wood; I knew laid the Calzarian. I recalled the stories my mum and dad told me of the place. I was told never to go in there, else I would be eaten by the monsters that hid in there.

We rolled onwards never straying from the dirt path and soon passed through the little wood.

Its leaves of golden brown mixed with the fresh green shoots overwhelmed my eyes as the shadows cast by the rising sun danced on the leaf littered path. This was Theven wood a place I had only heard about.

It was exciting and scary at the same time. But I had dad with me and knew he would protect me if anything came out from those trees. The bird song helped ease my fear and soon we were clear of the woods.

My eyes stung a little as we entered into the day light of the early morning sun.

A little way down the path I could see other carts ahead of us. All waiting outside the set of wooden gates, much like the ones that protected our village.

Beyond the tall wooden walls. I could see the huge stones and towers that made the Orrél wall.

Perhaps one day I will go beyond those walls and go see the castle.

It was our turn to pass through the gates. Two men with swords at their sides approached us.

They nodded to my dad.

‘Mor’nin. who’s this little fellow?’ One asked his dull grey eyes staring at me.

‘Markus, my son. Don’t you remember me telling you about him Fread?’

‘Yeah, never thought I’d get to see the lad though. Anyway, you know where to go, have a good day.’ He said moving onto the cart behind us.

Sinto was only a small city. Seeing it for the first time was amazing. Those tall buildings with tiled roofs, all pack together in rows along the cobbled streets.

Just to the left of those gates I could see the market. Tucked into the corner just beside the large stable for the horses to rest.

The stalls were all made of wood and had a cloth roof.

We pulled up at one of the stalls, between a man selling spice and a woman selling rugs.

Dad undid Sharof from the cart.

‘Could you lay out the jars whilst I take her to the stable. She deserves a good rest now. Be careful. I won’t be long.’

Dad was trusting me; I would not disappoint him!

As he wandered off with Sharof I busied myself with unloading the cart.

Those jars and pots were heavy and I struggled with lifting them but had managed a few before dad returned.

I helped him unload and pull the cart behind the stall. It was quite heavy for me, but dad had no issue with it. He must have been as strong as Sharof!

Most of the pots and jars were now on the wooden table in front of us alongside some of the bits of jewellery.

Dad kept the rest of the jewellery in the jar, right next to him and would often place the coins from the people in there too.

I helped him sell one of the necklaces, mum had made. A young woman had spotted it and had asked me about it. I was shy at first and almost hid behind dad. But I was soon speaking with her. Telling how it was home made with lots of love.

The older man she was with gave me ten Drakná for it and he placed it around her neck. She looked very pretty with it on. Those blue beads and shells really suited her.

Everything moved so fast in the market. Although I was very tired and my body ached, I kept going, helping dad sell the things we had brought with us.

I had never seen so many people in one place before! The swarms of people flooded the market so much I could hardly see the other stalls. The whole market buzzed with chatter and the cries of the merchants attempting to get another sale. Everyone seemed so happy and rushed about as if they were in a hurry. Many had not even taken time to look at what they had just got. Simply carrying it away with them as they rushed off to someplace.

I noticed that the building to the left of the market was just as busy as we were. People coming and going from it, all day.

‘I wonder what that building is?’ I found myself asking out loud.

‘That’s a bath house. People go into get clean. It’s like we do at home. But there’s a lot of people using a big pool of water to clean themselves and not an iron tub, like we have.

Perhaps I’ll take you in sometime, if we have the time and money.’ Dad explained to me and I blushed at the thought of bathing with other people, sure it would be like a huge family bath but the thought of strangers seeing me without any clothes on seemed to scare me. I knew it wasn’t something to be scared of but something inside made me uncomfortable with the idea. I was used to it at home and would bath with dad or mum. They had explained to me already about the difference between a boy and girl and that one day my body would look like dads’.

I was having so much fun and was too wrapped up in the excitement to realise that the sun was only an arm away from setting.

Panic gripped me as I realised the arm. I had just sold one of the cooking pots to a large man.

‘Dad...Dad! The sun.’ I panicked.

He smiled kindly at me and ruffled my hair.

‘It’s ok Markus. We shall be leaving soon. Still, plenty of time to get home before dark. Though we best start packing things up.’

Dad had always warned me of the night, when those monsters called Mankai come to hunt. Our lamps kept them away, but a few had managed to come into the village and took a Doogin.

Once again dad had left me to pack away the left-over pots and jars, there weren't many at all, about four or five. The one with all the money in I couldn't lift, it was too heavy. So, I just stood guard by it.

Once dad returned, he lifted the last pot on to the cart.

As he attached Sharof to the cart, I crawled into the back and carefully packed the hay, that lined the cart around them so the pots wouldn't smash.

It itched and scratched me, poking my bare skin through my thick tunic, but it didn't bother me too much as I huddled up against the pots.

I was going to guard them all the way home. No matter how heavy my eyes were with sleep and how tired my body was. I was determined to stay awake all the way home.

No sooner had the cart began to move away from the market, that first part of the bumpy ride along the cobbles and with the rocking of the cart I was soon sleep.

Chapter Two- The Wizard's Apprentice

‘Markus.... we’re home.’ My dad’s gentle words stirred me. After a few marks I shot up in shock and disappointment. I could not believe I had fallen asleep so quickly and so deeply. I had missed the whole ride home!

I rubbed the sleep from my eyes as I willed my weary body to move out of the cart.

I had not seen where dad got the big leather bag from but it looked very heavy.

‘Here, todays takings. We did very well today. Your mother will be so proud of us. Go on and take this to her, whilst I unload.’

I nodded and let out a yawn as I took that heavy bag from dad. I had to carry it with both hands and kept it close to my chest. I could feel the metal of the coins dig into me as I carried it inside.

Shocked I dropped the bag. Coins spilling out all over the place. I could feel the blood drain from my face as I rushed over to mum. She was pale and lay amongst a few broken cooking pots, right by the fire.

‘Mum!’ I cried touching her cold forehead.

Tears rolled down my face as I ran to get help.

‘DAD!’ I shouted choking on my tears as I ran out of the front door.
He poked his head out of the shed door.

‘What’s wrong?’ He asked.

‘Mum.’ Was all I could say before bursting into tears.

Through watery eyes I saw him run to the house, almost tripping over the door ledge.

I was too stunned to move and stood crying by the shed doors.

‘Markus...Fetch water... Hurry!’ Dads shout scared me. In shock and with tears still streaming down my face I ran. Stumbling over myself and falling into a roll.

I quickly got back up, didn’t even bother to brush off the dirt. I had to run to the nearest well.

Not looking where I was going, in my panic I ran head first in to the Doogin keeper Dean.

‘Hold up their young’un. What’s the ‘urry?’

‘Mum...water’ was all I could say through the tears as I rushed off.

The well wasn’t far now, I could see its wooden roof.

I turned that wheel as fast as I could until I heard the splash as the bucket hit the water below.

I pulled on the wheel and struggle to bring it back up. But I was determined to do it.

I was going to help mum no matter what!

Finally, I had pulled it up and standing on the stone step at the base of the well, I poured the water from that bucket into the one kept beside the well.

Using both hands I held the bucket to my chest and waded as fast as I could back to our home.

I came through the door and found dad and Dean had carried mum to the bedroom.

I rushed as fast as I could, some water slopping about the place as I moved and placed the bucket down with a grunt.

Dad soaked a rag in the cold water and placed it on mum's head.

'Is mum going to be ok?' I worried.

'I think so, the water will help cool her down.'

But mum had been cold when I touched her. Something must have happened to make her burn up whilst I stood like an idiot at that shed door.

'I'll go find Bulpazard or Dengard. They will know what to do.'
Dean said as dad gave him a nod.

'I'll help!' I panicked and ran after Dean. I didn't hear what dad had shouted, I had to focus and catch up with Dean. But he was too fast for my little legs.

Before I knew it, I had run past the wooden gates and out into the forest.

Suddenly it dawned on me that I was very lost and had no idea where to go.

I stood there in the middle of those trees, but I refused to cry. My fear kept me rooted to that spot as the darkness approached.

Shaking with cold and fear I looked up and knew what lay sleeping in those branches. I had to get away.

Perhaps if I run that way I'll get back to Oak Grove.

But my body wouldn't move. I could feel my heart pounding in my chest like it wanted to run from my body.

I dared not scream or make any sound. I knew those monsters would soon be waking up.

Somehow the thought of those monsters eating me made my legs work again and I ran.

I heard a twig or branch snapping in the fading light and jumped out of my skin.

I couldn't stop running despite my legs begging me to and my lungs felt as if they were on fire.

My body failed me soon after and I fell right into a pile of dead leaves.

I curled up as small as I could and hid there in the hope nothing would find me.

I could hear something out there. I hoped it couldn't hear my frantic heartbeat. I tried to quieten it and felt dizzy.

Once I saw those eyes, I thought I was done for. That yellow glint in the darkness, I hoped it hadn't seen or smelt me hiding here.

As soon as I heard it pass by my hiding spot I ran.

I heard a snarl and once again I saw those eyes. They seemed far away but I could not help but watch them follow me in the darkness.

I ran and finally tripped over something which sent me flying forwards.

I landed face down on the ground, tasting the bitter earth in my mouth.

I could hear the sound of a waterfall as I lay there too scared to open my eyes.

After some time, I had to look. I could no longer hear the monster and if it had found me, I would have been eaten by now! Slowly I opened my tightly closed eyes and lifted my head from the dirt.

The bright light of the moons stung and I had to squint until I could see better.

I knew where I was. Or at least thought I did. I looked to the blue mountain bathed in the light of the moons. A great waterfall fell from up high and crashed down into the pool at its base.

'Mount Aroa' I could not help but let out a relieved chuckle.

I remember Dean telling me about this place. We could see its outline from his farm.

He told me it was a special place where those who were ill came to and bathed in the water.

‘Tears of the Gods.’ He called the waterfall. At least here I was safe as long as the moons shone down.

I poked out my tongue to the darkness of the forest and lay down in the tall lush grass, so that I could stay hidden and as safe as I could be.

I was very scared and shivered a little in the cold air.

I raised my head up and looked into the darkness of the forest, I wasn’t sure what I expected to see out there. Perhaps it was the scurrying of animals that had made me look, or the fear that still gripped me.

I was all alone and nobody knew where I was. Too scared to move or cry out, I would be stuck here for tonight and hopefully I could find my way out in the day.

After relieving myself in the nearby bushes I once again lay down. Making myself as small as I could to attempt to keep warm.

I lay there staring up at the moons and as clouds passed by, I began to get scared again.

If the dark came here, those monsters would get me!

As the light faded, I panicked and tried to get up.

I would have to chance it. I could not stay out here all night!

My body would not move. My heart pounded as I struggled.
Something held me in that spot.

It would not let me cry out.

Silent tears rolled down my face.

‘Do not cry. I can help you.’ That voice echoed inside my head like the buzzing of flies.

‘Relax, I am here to help.’

‘Who are you?’ I was shocked that I again could speak.
Although my voice was hoarse and croaky.

‘I am a Fae. Sorry about taking your voice and restraining you. I thought you meant me harm.’ Its voice came again.

I sat up, but found that was all I could do. There before my eyes was a small silver light floating in the air.

‘Let me go, I won’t hurt you.’ I cried.

‘Sadly, I cannot fully unbind you. My magic doesn’t work that way. You must first strike a bargain with me; only then can I free you.’

I knew nothing of the Fae save for that which mum had told me. I knew they were messengers but until now I had never seen one.

‘What is it you want?’ I asked.

‘Nothing much, just a small drop of your blood, that will seal our bargain. I free you and you won’t harm me. Then maybe I can help you get out of here.’

The little light flickered and, in that moment, a glowing fair skinned woman stood before me. Her dress was made of leaves.

‘So, what do you say. A little blood and our bargain will be struck. I cannot take it from you, you have to willingly give it to me.’ She smiled warmly, pulling a small knife from her dress.

I could feel my hands move as I automatically reached for the knife.

‘That’s it. Take the knife and prick your finger.’

Before I could grab the knife handle a blinding ball of light slammed into the Fae and knocked her away.

‘Back! Get away from him!’ The deep voice commanded.

Another ball of light whizzed past me and slammed into the Fae.

She hissed. Showing sharp pointed teeth.

Her face changed and became long and stretched as too did her body. It looked like a stretched out old woman.

‘I said get back, foul shade!’